A Feel of Real

With our architectural visualisations, we do not intend to replicate an exact image of the finished home but instead aim to express our creativity by creating a virtual space we believe represent the experience of space we intend to bring into the build.

These illustrations are for us a form of art; non-mechanic and more subjective. As a part of conceptual design phase, it provides a standing-ground to explore ideas and possibilities while giving us and our clients a first visual look at the space we aim to create.

Technology nowadays gives us the artistic freedom to create very high-quality imagery which we intend to take full advantage of. As a business involved in both the art of design and the science of construction, we are passionate to learn about all the tools available today and the ones to come.

New Office, New Recruits

Nathan Beeck
Architectural Draftsperson

Nathan joined the Urbane team in February this year as our new architectural draftsperson. He draws from 25 years of experience in the building industry 13 years of which has been within the custom home space.

His favorite part of the job is the creative process of discussing ideas and lifestyle requirements to deliver the right design and then watching this translate into the built form.

A great asset to the team with his design philosophy: An adaptive design method unconstrained by traditional methods.

"We should always be looking to try new things and push the limits to produce exceptional homes"

A Workforce Expansion

With our growing client scope and people following our work on social media, we were given the opportunity to grow as a business and brand. To maintain this development and sustain accrual growth, we consistently work on processes in terms of workforce, collaboration, communication, technology and more. Our goal is to keep expanding our reach and share of passion for design and construction with the most people possible.
